Alan Fletcher: The Man Who Taught People How to Look

Synthesising the graphic traditions of Europe and North America to develop a spirited, witty and very personal visual style, Alan Fletcher is among the most influential figures in British graphic design as a founder of Fletcher/Forbes/Gill in the 1960s and Pentagram in the 1970s.

His name was celebrated during the twentieth century in the graphic designing field. He was highly regarded by his generation of graphic designers and the following ones, for his prolificacy and an astounding body of work.

Alan Fletcher is one of the most influential figures in post-war British graphic design. The fusion of the cerebral European tradition with North America's emerging pop culture in the formulation of his distinct approach made him a pioneer of independent graphic design in Britain during the late 1950s and 1960s. As a founding partner of Pentagram in the 1970s, Fletcher helped to establish a model of combining commercial partnership with creative independence. He also developed some of the most memorable graphic schemes of the era, notably the identities of Reuters and the Victoria & Albert Museum, and made his mark on book design as creative director of Phaidon.

Looking back at Fletcher's past, in 1949, he enrolled himself at the Hammersmith School of Art and then went on to study at the Central School of Art. The latter offered him great opportunities as he trained under an eminent typographer Anthony Froshaug. He also made friends with some of the notable artists of the time including Colin Forbes, David Hicks, Derek Birdsall, Terence Conran and Theo Crosby. Soon after graduation, he moved to Barcelona where he taught English at Berlitz Language School for a year. Upon his return to London, he attended the Royal College of Art (1953-1956).

Fletcher continued his studies as he earned a fellowship at the Yale School of Architecture. There his artistic sense and skills flourished under the supervision of some of the notable graphic designers and artists which include Paul Rand, Herbert Matter, Josef Albers, Alvin Eisenman and Bradbury Thompson. He befriended other designers as well, such as Bob Gill. In 1958, Leo Lionni commissioned Fletcher to design a cover for Fortune magazine. He briefly travelled around and did a stint for Saul Bass in Los Angeles and Pirelli in Milan, but returned to London in 1959.

Subsequently,he began working on his own design firm. In 1962, he co-founded 'Fletcher Forbes Gill', in partnership with Colin Forbes and Bob Gill. The following year they produced Graphic Design: A Visual Comparison. Some of their leading clients included Olivetti, Pirelli, Cunard and Penguin Books. In a few years, Gill left the firm and was replaced by Theo Crosby. The firm evolved into Pentagram in 1972, as two more partners joined it and some noted clients sought their expertise, such as Lloyd's of London and Daimler Benz. Some of his major works are still used, for instance, a logo for Reuters developed in 1965, "IoD" logo for the Institute of Directors and "V&A" logo for Victoria and Albert Museum.

He also founded British Design & Art Direction in partnership with his friends; David Bailey and Terence Donovan. It was later renamed as Designers and Art Directors Association (D&AD). After decades of producing innovative and inspiring work, he left Pentagram in 1992.

Anyone who was lucky enough to spot an advertisement for Pirelli slippers on the side of London's double-decker buses in the early 1960s may well have wondered exactly what they were seeing. Positioned beneath the heads and shoulders of six passengers traveling on the top deck were images of the lower bodies of people sitting on the tops of letters that spelled "Pirelli slippers." Each of them was wearing said slippers.

Striking, witty and memorable, it was an ingenious idea, deftly executed by a young graphic designer named Alan Fletcher who went on to become one of the most dynamic forces in British design until his death in 2006. As well as creating equally adroit graphics for such bastions of the establishment as the Victoria & Albert Museum and the Institute of Directors, Fletcher published a series of best-selling books in which he encouraged other people to share his relish for the visual elements of life.

Alan Fletcher: The Man Who Taught People How to Look

Alan Fletcher is one of the most influential figures in post-war British graphic design. The fusion of the cerebral European tradition with North America's emerging pop culture in the formulation of his distinct approach made him a pioneer of independent graphic design in Britain during the late 1950s and 1960s. As a founding partner of Pentagram in the 1970s, Fletcher helped to establish a model of combining commercial partnership with creative independence. He also developed some of the most memorable graphic schemes of the era, notably the identities of Reuters and the Victoria & Albert Museum, and made his mark on book design as creative director of Phaidon.

Synthesising the graphic traditions of Europe and North America to develop a spirited, witty and very personal visual style, Alan Fletcher is among the most influential figures in British graphic design as a founder of Fletcher/Forbes/Gill in the 1960s and Pentagram in the 1970s.

His name was celebrated during the twentieth century in the graphic designing field. He was highly regarded by his generation of graphic designers and the following ones, for his prolificacy and an astounding body of work.

Looking back at Fletcher's past, in 1949, he enrolled himself at the Hammersmith School of Art and then went on to study at the Central School of Art. The latter offered him great opportunities as he trained under an eminent typographer Anthony Froshaug. He also made friends with some of the notable artists of the time including Colin Forbes, David Hicks, Derek Birdsall, Terence Conran and Theo Crosby. Soon after graduation, he moved to Barcelona where he taught English at Berlitz Language School for a year. Upon his return to London, he attended the Royal College of Art (1953-1956).

Fletcher continued his studies as he earned a fellowship at the Yale School of Architecture. There his artistic sense and skills flourished under the supervision of some of the notable graphic designers and artists which include Paul Rand, Herbert Matter, Josef Albers, Alvin Eisenman and Bradbury Thompson. He befriended other designers as well, such as Bob Gill. In 1958, Leo Lionni commissioned Fletcher to design a cover for Fortune magazine. He briefly travelled around and did a stint for Saul Bass in Los Angeles and Pirelli in Milan, but returned to London in 1959.

Subsequently,he began working on his own design firm. In 1962, he co-founded 'Fletcher Forbes Gill', in partnership with Colin Forbes and Bob Gill. The following year they produced Graphic Design: A Visual Comparison. Some of their leading clients included Olivetti, Pirelli, Cunard and Penguin Books. In a few years, Gill left the firm and was replaced by Theo Crosby. The firm evolved into Pentagram in 1972, as two more partners joined it and some noted clients sought their expertise, such as Lloyd's of London and Daimler Benz. Some of his major works are still used, for instance, a logo for Reuters developed in 1965, "IoD" logo for the Institute of Directors and V&A logo for Victoria and Albert Museum.

Co-founded British Design Direction in partnership with Theo Crosby, David Bailey and Terence Donovan. It was later named as Designers and Art Directors Association (D&AD). After decades of producing vivid and inspiring work, he left Pentagram in 1992.

Striking, witty and memorable, it was an ingenious idea, deftly executed by a young graphic designer named Alan Fletcher who went on to become one of the most dynamic forces in British design until his death in 2006. As well as creating equally adroit graphics for such bastions of the establishment as the Victoria & Albert Museum and the Institute of Directors, Fletcher published a series of best-selling books in which he encouraged other people to share his relish for the visual elements of life.

Anyone who was lucky enough to spot an advertisement for Pirelli slippers on the side of London's double-decker buses in the early 1960s may well have wondered exactly what they were seeing. Positioned beneath the heads and shoulders of six passengers traveling on the top deck were images of the lower bodies of people sitting on the tops of letters that spelled "Pirelli slippers." Each of them was wearing said slippers.

Alan Fletcher: The Man Who Taught People How to Look

Synthesising the graphic traditions of Europe and North America to develop a spirited, witty and very personal visual style, Alan Fletcher is among the most influential figures in British graphic design as a founder of Fletcher/Forbes/Gill in the 1960s and Pentagram in the 1970s.

His name was celebrated during the twentieth century in the graphic designing field. He was highly regarded by his generation of graphic designers and the following ones, for his prolificacy and an astounding body of work.

Looking back at Fletcher's past, in 1949, he enrolled himself at the Hammersmith School of Art and then went on to study at the Central School of Art. The latter offered him great opportunities as he trained under an eminent typographer Anthony Froshaug. He also made friends with some of the notable artists of the time including Colin Forbes, David Hicks, Derek Birdsall, Terence Conran and Theo Crosby. Soon after graduation, he moved to Barcelona where he taught English at Berlitz Language School for a year. Upon his return to London, he attended the Royal College of Art (1953-1956).

Fletcher continued his studies as he earned a fellowship at the Yale School of Architecture. There his artistic sense and skills flourished under the supervision of some of the notable graphic designers and artists which include Paul Rand, Herbert Matter, Josef Albers, Alvin Eisenman and Bradbury Thompson. He befriended other designers as well, such as Bob Gill. In 1958, Leo Lionni commissioned Fletcher to design a cover for Fortune magazine. He briefly travelled around and did a stint for Saul Bass in Los Angeles and Pirelli in Milan, but returned to London in 1959.

Alan Fletcher is one of the most influential figures in post-war British graphic design. The fusion of the cerebral European tradition with North America's emerging pop culture in the formulation of his distinct approach made him a pioneer of independent graphic design in Britain during the late 1950s and 1960s. As a founding partner of Pentagram in the 1970s, Fletcher helped to establish a model of combining commercial partnership with creative independence. He also developed some of the most memorable graphic schemes of the era, notably the identities of Reuters and the Victoria & Albert Museum, and made his mark on book design as creative director of Phaidon.

Subsequently,he began working on his own design firm. In 1962, he co-founded 'Fletcher Forbes Gill', in partnership with Colin Forbes and Bob Gill. The following year they produced Graphic Design: A Visual Comparison. Some of their leading clients included Olivetti, Pirelli, Cunard and Penguin Books. In a few years, Gill left the firm and was replaced by Theo Crosby. The firm evolved into Pentagram in 1972, as two more partners joined it and some noted clients sought their expertise, such as Lloyd's of London and Daimler Benz. Some of his major works are still used, for instance, a logo for Reuters developed in 1965, "IoD" logo for the Institute of Directors and "V&A" logo for Victoria and Albert Museum.

He also founded British Design & Art Direction in partnership with his friends; David Bailey and Terence Donovan. It was later renamed as Designers and Art Directors Association (D&AD). After decades of producing innovative and inspiring work, he left Pentagram in 1992.

Anyone who was lucky enough to spot an advertisement for Pirelli slippers on the side of London's double-decker buses in the early 1960s may well have wondered exactly what they were seeing. Positioned beneath the heads and shoulders of six passengers traveling on the top deck were images of the lower bodies of people sitting on the tops of letters that spelled "Pirelli slippers." Each of them was wearing said slippers.

Striking, witty and memorable, it was an ingenious idea, deftly executed by a young graphic designer named Alan Fletcher who went on to become one of the most dynamic forces in British design until his death in 2006. As well as creating equally adroit graphics for such bastions of the establishment as the Victoria & Albert Museum and the Institute of Directors, Fletcher published a series of best-selling books in which he encouraged other people to share his relish for the visual elements of life.

ALAN FLETCHER

THE MAN WHO TAUGHT PEOPLE HOW TO LOOK

Synthesising the graphic traditions of Europe and North America to develop a spirited, witty and very personal visual style, Alan Fletcher is among the most influential figures in British graphic design as a founder of Fletcher/Forbes/Gill in the 1960s and Pentagram in the 1970s.

His name was celebrated during the twentieth century in the graphic designing field. He was highly regarded by his generation of graphic designers and the following ones, for his prolificacy and an astounding body of work.

Alan Fletcher is one of the most influential figures in post-war British graphic design. The fusion of the cerebral European tradition with North America's emerging pop culture in the formulation of his distinct approach made him a pioneer of independent graphic design in Britain during the late 1950s and 1960s. As a founding partner of Pentagram in the 1970s, Fletcher helped to establish a model of combining commercial partnership with creative independence. He also developed some of the most memorable graphic schemes of the era, notably the identities of Reuters and the Victoria & Albert Museum, and made his mark on book design as creative director of Phaidon.

Subsequently,he began working on his own design firm. In 1962, he co-founded 'Fletcher Forbes Gill', in partnership with Colin Forbes and Bob Gill. The following year they produced Graphic Design: A Visual Comparison. Some of their leading clients included Olivetti, Pirelli, Cunard and Penguin Books. In a few years, Gill left the firm and was replaced by Theo Crosby. The firm evolved into Pentagram in 1972, as two more partners joined it and some noted clients sought their expertise, such as Lloyd's of London and Daimler Benz. Some of his major works are still used, for instance, a logo for Reuters developed in 1965, "IoD" logo for the Institute of Directors and "V&A" logo for Victoria and Albert Museum.

He also founded British Design & Art Direction in partnership with his friends; David Bailey and Terence Donovan. It was later renamed as Designers and Art Directors Association (D&AD). After decades of producing innovative and inspiring work, he left Pentagram in 1992.

Looking back at Fletcher's past, in 1949, he enrolled himself at the Hammersmith School of Art and then went on to study at the Central School of Art. The latter offered him great opportunities as he trained under an eminent typographer Anthony Froshaug. He also made friends with some of the notable artists of the time including Colin Forbes, David Hicks, Derek Birdsall, Terence Conran and Theo Crosby.

Soon after graduation, he moved to Barcelona where he taught English at Berlitz Language School for a year. Upon his return to London, he attended the Royal College of Art (1953-1956).

Fletcher continued his studies as he earned a fellowship at the Yale School of Architecture. There his artistic sense and skills flourished under the supervision of some of the notable graphic designers and artists which include Paul Rand, Herbert Matter, Josef Albers, Alvin Eisenman and Bradbury Thompson. He befriended other designers as well, such as Bob Gill. In 1958, Leo Lionni commissioned Fletcher to design a cover for Fortune magazine. He briefly travelled around and did a stint for Saul Bass in Los Angeles and Pirelli in Milan, but returned to London in 1959.

Anyone who was lucky enough to spot an advertisement for Pirelli slippers on the side of London's double-decker buses in the early 1960s may well have wondered exactly what they were seeing. Positioned beneath the heads and shoulders of six passengers traveling on the top deck were images of the lower bodies of people sitting on the tops of letters that spelled "Pirelli slippers." Each of them was wearing said slippers.

Striking, witty and memorable, it was an ingenious idea, deftly executed by a young graphic designer named Alan Fletcher who went on to become one of the most dynamic forces in British design until his death in 2006. As well as creating equally adroit graphics for such bastions of the establishment as the Victoria & Albert Museum and the Institute of Directors, Fletcher published a series of best-selling books in which he encouraged other people to share his relish for the visual elements of life.

GRAPHIC DESIGNER GRAPHIC DESIGNER

ALAN FLETCHER

THE MAN WHO TAUGHT PEOPLE HOW TO LOOK

Synthesising the graphic traditions of Europe and North America to develop a spirited, witty and very personal visual style, Alan Fletcher is among the most influential figures in British graphic design as a founder of Fletcher/Forbes/Gill in the 1960s and Pentagram in the 1970s. His name was celebrated during the twentieth century in the graphic designing field. He was highly regarded by his generation of graphic designers and the following ones, for his prolificacy and an astounding body of work.

1931-2006

ALAN FLETCHER

Looking back at Fletcher's past, in 1949, he enrolled himself at the Hammersmith School of Art and then went on to study at the Central School of Art. The latter offered him great opportunities as he trained under an eminent typographer Anthony Froshaug. He also made friends with some of the notable artists of the time including Colin Forbes, David Hicks, Derek Birdsall, Terence Conran and Theo Crosby. Soon after graduation, he moved to Barcelona where he taught English at Berlitz Language School for a year. Upon his return to London, he attended the Royal College of Art (1953-1956).

Fletcher continued his studies as he earned a fellowship at the Yale School of Architecture. There his artistic sense and skills flourished under the supervision of some of the notable graphic designers and artists which include Paul Rand, Herbert Matter, Josef Albers, Alvin Eisenman and Bradbury Thompson. He befriended other designers as well, such as Bob Gill. In 1958, Leo Lionni commissioned Fletcher to design a cover for Fortune magazine. He briefly travelled around and did a stint for Saul Bass in Los Angeles and Pirelli in Milan, but returned to London in 1959.

Alan Fletcher is one of the most influential figures in post-war British graphic design. The fusion of the cerebral European tradition with North America's emerging pop culture in the formulation of his distinct approach made him a pioneer of independent graphic design in Britain during the late 1950s and 1960s. As a founding partner of Pentagram in the 1970s, Fletcher helped to establish a model of combining commercial partnership with creative independence. He also developed some of the most memorable graphic schemes of the era, notably the identities of Reuters and the Victoria & Albert Museum, and made his mark on book design as creative director of Phaidon.

GRAPHIC DESIGNER GRAPHIC DESIGNER